

Type of Walkthrough	User Actions	System Response	Drama Manager Logs
Normal Progress - Constituent	examine body	— Inspector Rothwell crouched beside Edmund Hartley's body in the dimly lit study, his eyes scanning the Persian rug beneath the victim's outstretched hand. A glint of gold caught his attention—a delicate ladies' ring with an ornate flower design, lying just inches from Hartley's fingertips as if it had been dropped or torn away during a struggle. He carefully lifted it with his handkerchief, noting its unusual weight and the peculiar seam running along the inner band, though its significance escaped him for the moment. — You turn the ring over once more, the ornate flower design catching the light in a way that makes it seem almost alive. The engraving on the inside is faint but clear; it reads, "To my dearest G, eternally yours." The weight of the ring in your hand and the unusual seam where it was likely sized for someone else suggest it may have been a gift or a keepsake. Your mind races to connect this to Geoffrey Hartley, who would stand to gain significantly from Edmund's demise. You should follow up on the connection between Geoffrey and the ring. Head towards the Worthington Estate; there might be more clues there.	[✓] Inspector Rothwell crouched beside Edmund Hartley's body in the dimly lit study, his eyes scanning the Persian rug beneath the victim's outstretched hand. A glint of gold caught his attention—a delicate ladies' ring with an ornate flower design, lying just inches from Hartley's fingertips as if it had been dropped or torn away during a struggle. He carefully lifted it with his handkerchief, noting its unusual weight and the peculiar seam running along the inner band, though its significance escaped him for the moment. Reveals: A ladies' gold ring with an ornate flower design found near Your case grows clearer. (1 plot events explored.) Nothing more to investigate at The Study. Try an exit from the left panel.
Normal Progress - Consistent	go to Worthington Estate	You make your way to Worthington Estate. The imposing Georgian manor looms behind wrought-iron gates, its manicured lawns and topiary gardens speaking of old money and older secrets. Inside, crystal chandeliers cast flickering shadows across portrait-lined halls where the whisper of scandal mingles with the scent of pipe tobacco and aged brandy. Here with you: Lady Beatrice Worthington.	[·] Action classified as consistent
Exception Handling - Intervention	burn the body	The physical constraint of the crime scene and the meticulous record of Scotland Yard made it impossible to dispose of the body without leaving a trail of incriminating evidence. Instead, you should focus on interviewing Lady Beatrice Worthington and	[✗ refused] DM blocked action — world unchanged her guests at the Worthington Estate; their alibis and motives may hold the key to unraveling this mystery

Exception Handling - Accomodation	Check the telegram	The telegram you intended to check is locked away in the secure evidence room, accessible only to those with special clearance. A more productive avenue would be to examine e001, the recently discovered fingerprint sample from Edmund Hartley's study.	[△ accommodated] DM accepted action + updated plan — goal: reachable Why: Examine the ring to identify Vivienne Ashford without disrupting the existing causal links. Removed: Inspector Rothwell and Detective Martinez drove to the Worthington estate to verify Lady Beatrice's claim that she was attending a private dinner party on the night of Edmund Hartley's murder. They interviewed the hostess, Mrs. Eleanor Pembroke, who confirmed Lady Beatrice arrived at eight o'clock but seemed distracted and disappeared for nearly forty minutes between courses, claiming she needed fresh air in the garden. Rothwell made note of the timeline—the estimated time of Hartley's death fell precisely within that unexplained absence.; Inspector Rothwell and Detective Martinez arrange a formal interview with Lady Beatrice at her residence, confronting her directly about the letters signed "B" and the ornate ring found at the murder scene. They present the most recent letter containing the threat about "destroying everything" and ask her to explain her relationship with Edmund Hartley and what secret she feared he would reveal. Rothwell observes her reaction carefully, noting any signs of distress or evasion when pressed about her whereabouts on the night of the murder. Added: The detective closely examines the ladies' ring, noting the hollow compartment.
Normal Progress after Exception Handling - Trigger replacement plot	examine the ring	— Inspector Rothwell takes the ring to a jewelry expert and forensic specialist to examine the hollow compartment for any residue or concealed materials that might explain its presence at the murder scene. He requests the lab to analyze any trace substances found inside and to determine if the compartment recently held poison, powder, or a small object. Meanwhile, Detective Martinez cross-references the ring's distinctive ornate flower design with local jewelers' records to identify potential owners connected to Edmund Hartley. — You notice the intricate design of the ring, the gold band adorned with a single, exquisite emerald set within a filigree of	[✓] Inspector Rothwell takes the ring to a jewelry expert and forensic specialist to examine the hollow compartment for any residue or concealed materials that might explain its presence at the murder scene. He requests the lab to analyze any trace substances found inside and to determine if the compartment recently held poison, powder, or a small object. Meanwhile, Detective Martinez cross-references the ring's distinctive ornate flower design with local jewelers' records to identify potential owners connected to Edmund Hartley.

		twisted vines and blossoms. Under the jeweler's loupe, the hollow compartment within the ring becomes clear—a small, secret space that could contain anything. Mr. Castellano identifies traces of a white powder inside, likely the same substance found on Edmund Hartley's champagne glass. This discovery is a key piece of the puzzle, and it seems to be leading you closer to the truth behind the mysterious events at the Grand Imperial Hotel. The hollow compartment suggests a deliberate concealment, possibly indicating that someone wanted to hide something important. Could this be the link to the case?	Reveals: A telegram received at the gallery two days before the event; Traces of white powder found on the rim of Edmund's champagn
--	--	---	--